Record of Battalion

On December 21st, 1915, authorization came from Ottawa of the 168th battalion under command of Lieut.-Col. W. T. McMullen of Woodstock. It very soon became known as "Oxford's Own," and the young men of the historic old county were not slow in responding to the call to arms. From their offices, from behind the counter, from farm and factory they came, and unhesitatingly placed their lives at the disposal of Country and Empire, at that time in the very midst of a grim struggle for their existence. By the time the battalion went into camp at London on June 4st, 1916, the fullest strength had about been reached, namely nine hundred and forty-three officers and other ranks.

TO CAMP BORDEN: ON TO ENGLAND

After a brief training at Camp Francis in London, the battalion was ordered to proceed to Camp Borden and, with twenty-four hours' notice, entrained for this military centre on July 9th. Then followed four months of strenuous preparation for the great conflict, and on October 27th seven hundred and thirteen men—some of the originals had been transferred to other units or discharged as unfit for military service—entrained at Camp Borden for the east, embarking at Halifax on October 30th, and reaching Liverpool on November 11th.

Reaching West Sandling Camp, the men of the battalion were taken on the strength of the 12th and the 39th Reserve Battalions, with a few to other units, where their military training was completed for active service at the front.

• AT THE FRONT: BATTLE HONORS

Though the 168th Battalion had ceased to exist in name, the men of Oxford from January 1st, 1917, until historic Mons was reached on November 11th, 1918, lived and fought and died upholding the best traditions of the county and covering with imperishable glory the name of the old battalion. Their record speaks more eloquently for itself than could the pen of the most ardent admirer and historian. Of the seven hundred and thirteen men who stood on the decks of H.M.S. "Lapland" to watch the lengthening shadows of Canada's eastern coast melt into the twilight of that autumn evening of November 1st, 1916, one hundred and fifty-eight did not return; with hearts still unafraid they climbed to the mountain peaks of human service and spent their life's blood in a righteous cause. One other member of the battalion lost his life while training in Canada. Twenty-two per cent. of their overseas strength made the supreme sacrifice. Two hundred and fifty-six men of "Oxford's Own" were wounded, making the total casualties four hundred and eighteen, or fifty-eight per cent of the overseas strength.

From January 1st, 1917, these men of Oxford reinforced many of the service battalions in France, taking part in all the subsequent operations in which the Canadian corps participated. At Vimy Ridge, at Hill 70, at Passchendaele, at Amiens, at the Second Battle of Arras, at Cambrai, Valenciennes and, finally, at Mons, they fought and fell; and wherever they went it was said of them that their efficiency as fighting men was second to none and that their record was one of which they might justly be proud.
